Fribourg profile
The Art History Domain offers a doctoral training in French and German. The field of study is at the crossroads between many disciplines (history, theology, philosophy, anthropology, semiotics, literature). Art History – taken in its broadest sense to include architectural history and visual studies, etc. – considers works of art from Classical Antiquity to the current globalised times. It analyses the complex nature of their functions and meanings (in historical, aesthetic, cult, economic, cultural and social terms). The study of material culture and of visual and textual systems of representation provides a privileged entry point from which to consider the history of past and present societies.

Through its doctoral programme, the Art History Domain wishes to create, further and disseminate scientific knowledge, in order to foster intellectual debate on universal cultural history. The doctorate involves the formulation and public defence of thorough and in-depth research work, conducted in close collaboration between the doctoral student and the thesis supervisor (or co-supervisor).

Theses conducted within the Domain might address themes concerning the following, but are not limited to:

- Works of art in their materiality
- Artistic heritage
- The functions and uses of images and objects in their historical development
- The forms and functions of architecture
- The dynamics of the perception and reception of artworks
- Artistic transfers and cultural interactions
- Spatial and visual strategies evoking the powerful and the sacred
- Artistic media and forms of visual communication
- The various stakeholders in artistic production (artists, sponsors, mediators, administrators, beholders and their relationships)
- The status of the artist, the universe of the workshop and Salons or exhibitions
- Body image in Western traditions (anatomy, portraiture, physiognomy, costume, body movements)
- Image and magic (vernacular culture, limits of rationality, counter-powers, marginal practices, etc.)

The Art History Domain favours both fundamental research and work aimed at more practical applications. German- or French-speaking doctoral students may enrol in different doctoral schools. Various other opportunities may arise during the writing of the thesis: attendance and/or organisation of conferences, study days, study trips, partnerships with specialists in the scientific community, teaching, etc.
