This study programme has an international and interdisciplinary orientation. It provides specialised, in-depth knowledge of social phenomena, institutions, structures, processes, practices and their change. The main focus is on the topics of social inequalities, poverty, work, conflicts, delinquency and gender, and on the cross-sectional fields of politics, social policy and social work. Emphasis is placed on theory-driven comparative research and teaching, as well as on being able to think critically and call things into question. The methodological training covers a wide range: both qualitative and quantitative empirical methods of social research are taught. Students choose one of the three Master’s options and may complement the in-depth programme by means of a complementary minor study programme. The study programme is offered in German (a number of courses may be offered in English). Bilingual studies (German/French) are possible.

Profile of the study programme

The goal of this Master’s programme is to convey specialised, in-depth knowledge of social phenomena, institutions, structures, processes, practices and their change. At its core are the actions of people, groups, organisations and states and the relationships between them. Further matters of interest are the way in which people live and shape their relationships and how they give meaning to their actions and the world they live in. The orientation of the programme is international and interdisciplinary. The emphasis is on theory-driven comparative research and teaching, as well as on having the ability to think critically and argue on the basis of evidence and reasoning. The methodological training is broadly conceived: both qualitative and quantitative empirical methods of social research are taught. Students completing the programme are capable of conducting and interpreting complex, qualitative and quantitative research. This opens the gateway to a variety of professions and fields of activity.

Fribourg Profile

The language of tuition is German, a number of courses may be offered in English. Bilingual studies (German/French) are possible.

One of the following options must be selected:

- Option Sociology
  This option combines sociological theories and empirical social research with the analysis of various topics dealing with issues in the Global North and the Global South. In particular, it offers in-depth comparative analyses of current challenges in various areas of society under conditions of increasing transnationalisation of economics, politics and culture, exacerbation of ecological problems, growth of the world population, and demographic aging in developed market societies and in countries and regions of the Global South. This option promotes a theoretically sound, critical awareness of global inequalities and connections and serves as an introduction to international social analyses.

- Option Social Policy and Social Work
  Two core issues are paramount in this option. Social and cultural differences (such as education, income, gender or nationality) are central to the justification and understanding of social inequalities. In many cases, these reflect varying degrees of access to economic, social and other societal resources. In such instances, latent and manifest social problems develop, which can culminate in political and economic conflicts or delinquency. The topic Production of Welfare focuses on the question of differences between welfare regimes. Social policy and social work are understood as institutional answers to prevention or management of social problems and conflicts on a local, national and global/international level.

- Option Politics and Society
  This option has a politological orientation. One focal element is that students should be given the opportunity to study aspects of comparative political studies at a more intensive level in lectures and seminars. Here, special attention is paid to political developments in Western and Eastern Europe, which also include illiberal tendencies in politics and society (e.g. populism, increasing power of the executive). Another element is that a central actor of the political system, the state, is examined in a European and a global context. Invariably, strength and weakness of the state are also functions of a social context in which other actors, crises and conflicts are able to challenge the state or even call it into question.

The specialisation programmes worth 30 ECTS credits — Sociology, Social Policy and Social Work, Politics and Society and Gender, Society, Social Policy — are smaller units which allow students to complement this Master's programme within the Domain.

Learning outcomes and career openings

Learning outcomes
The course of studies provides competences with regard to a variety of problem-related or societal demands by a social lifeworld which is constantly changing. The aim is to raise awareness of real or perceived changes in social problem areas so as to enable a critical reaction in a given situation using scientific insights and concepts, and employing quantitative and qualitative methods.

Career openings
This Master's programme provides the theoretical and conceptual tools required for (executive) posts in public and private organisations, and for research and teaching, as well as in the media. This training readies students for a professional activity in a wide variety of fields, such as analysis, planning, development, leadership, implementation and evaluation of projects in the social services sector; market research and opinion polling, teaching and training, and work within associations, international organisations, development cooperation organisations, or relief agencies.
