How do children, adolescents and adults learn? And how do they develop in a given social environment? It is to these educational questions that the educational sciences deliver a response. At the Bachelor level, the students acquire all-round theoretical knowledge of academic and social education, socialisation theory and educational psychology. They also learn quantitative and qualitative research methods and, through practical research and workshops as well as seminars geared to the professional context, how to apply the theoretical bases. The study programme is specially designed to place equal importance on theoretical and systematic, historical and empirical approaches to educational research. The course is taught in collaboration with the teacher training department, which gives students additional knowledge of school teaching.

The following career prospects are open to them:

- Project work in an educational context;
- Research-focused activities and duties in an educational or social context;
- Counselling and social work;
- Media and public relations.

Following their Bachelor's degree, students can take a Master's degree at the University of Fribourg's Educational Sciences Department.
