Fribourg profile

Diversity in method and pluralism in the range of subjects and philosophical currents studied are the distinguishing features of the doctoral programme of the Philosophy Department in the University of Fribourg. The Department regularly obtains research funding to promote doctoral studies as well as to create research groups drawing on the competences of the Department’s members as well as that of numerous experienced scholars. Professors in charge of specific domains of research supervise doctoral students who are given the opportunity to discuss their work in weekly colloquia as well as to participate in activities organised at the doctoral level in collaboration with other universities in Switzerland and abroad.

In the domain of ancient philosophy, theses can be supervised on Greek and Roman thought from the Pre-Socratic philosophers through to the Byzantine period. Equally, the reception of ancient philosophy during the Renaissance is a welcome subject. Research in the domain is concentrated on Platonic thought (Plato, the Old Academy, Middle Platonism, Plotinus, the late Neo-Platonists, Jewish and Christian Platonism). Research projects in metaphysics, cosmology and physics, the theory of knowledge, psychology, and ethics are encouraged. A command of ancient Greek and/or Latin is required. Doctoral candidates participate in the Doctoral School of Ancient and Medieval Philosophy organised every year in collaboration with the universities of Lausanne and Geneva.

In the domain of medieval philosophy, research is integrated into an interdisciplinary context, open to the reception of new currents of thought and the one between phenomenality and intentionality. In this area a systematic approach is practised in Fribourg which gives weight to rational intuition and to phenomenological reflection. Proposals for theses within the philosophy of language, epistemology, ontology and metaphysics, as well as on questions at the intersection of philosophy and the cognitive sciences are also welcome.

Doctoral candidates in ethics, political philosophy, the philosophy of culture, aesthetics, and philosophy in Eastern Europe and Russia, have the possibility of taking part in three to four lectures per semester by external lecturers. For postgraduates preparing a Master’s degree or PhD, a one-day colloquium is organised towards the end of each semester at which advanced and doctoral students have the occasion to present and discuss their research with one another and the professors in attendance. Thesis supervision principally takes the form of personal tutoring by professors and other members of the teaching staff who are attentive to the pluralism of methods and issues. Research themes vary widely, including the history of theoretical and practical philosophy of the modern era, the philosophy of culture, aesthetics, and philosophical currents in Eastern Europe and Russia, as well as political philosophy and ethics.
